Examines in quite useful detail the strategic planning process for IEPs, beginning with a lengthy discussion of the development process and discussing necessary conditions in the implementation stage. Argues instead that IEPs be treated as the nontraditional but valuable entities that they are. While Ponder and Powell are not primarily concerned with addressing the utility of IEPs, the cost and duration data in these projects is collected and analyzed. The report covers the key areas of discussion and contention, including attention to future theory and practice. Evaluation of Project Delivery Methods Chapter: Swales concurs and complains also that the model proposed by Lynch is too restrictive. A - References Page Share. She suggests that a major role of IEP administrators is to understand university hierarchies and establish connections to "negotiate across boundaries" in order to decrease IEP marginalization.
