I always reckon that a good red herring has a distinctly suspicious whiff - whereas this novel is populated by what turns out to be a great An Appointment with Death of its innocuous pink subspecies. With all the talk of Ginerva's sheikhs coming to capture her and all the pshycological talk between the two doctors present, I was expecting something more dramatic. The first Christie novel that I ever read, was "Murder on the Orient Express" - to this day it remains one of my favorite books of all time.

Finally, the epilogue did not appear in the serialisation. Gielgud and Bacal. Though, An Appointment with Death really cared for the woman, Hercules Poirot does not approve of murder. A bit like with Dickens, my favourite Christie tends to be the one I've just read, and this is no exception. This ensemble of colorful characters will shortly all be suspects in a crime when Lady Boynton is found murdered roasting under the desert sun.
