Finally, a more consistent application of policy incentives for investment and growth across space is called for, especially recognizing China's unique combination of fiscal decentralization and centralized government structure. After growing faster than anticipated in China is expected to slow moderately to 6. And, adopting a longer perspective, growth in the region has been particularly strong. Excluding China, growth in developing East Asia is expected to decline from 6. Adjusting to a changing world English In the six months since the previous East Asia and Pacific economic update, the regional economic landscape has been dominated by two key developments in the global economy. The region's well-capitalized banks and much improved banking supervision the private sector is once again becoming the engine of growth, confidence is returning, and trade flows have returned to pre-crisis levels. Deeper integration will encourage agglomeration economies and intra-industry trade, support sustainable urbanization, lower costs, and increase international competitiveness.
