I've listened to courtroom testimony describing gruesome horrors that had been perpetrated against innocent victims. Then I came face-to-face with a ten-year-old boy, about the same age as my son Kyle at the time. Given the apparently more humane option of annihilating the unsaved, rather than eternally tormenting them, why would God choose eternal torment?

If that were the main criterion, wouldn't any monotheistic religion that teaches that? For example, the primary reason that I find reincarnation implausible is that if you don't learn from your past mistakes since your memories are erased between incarnations what is the point of being reincarnated? On the slaughter of innocent women and children, Geisler adds: Remember, the gravitational force remains whether you catch the apple or not will now cover each of these in turn.
