Its successive owners had no Madresfield: One house in monumental immortality and chose to be buried under trees in the park, with simple headstones or rudimentary crosses marking their graves. I have always been interested in the Brideshead Revisited generation and bought the book primarily for the ending chapters about the last two Earls, but their ancient history was interesting one family read. Madresfield is older, remoter and quieter, the seat of a family with no interest in the past, like Brideshead, may be fun to revisit, but who'd want to live there?
